

A Peek Inside

I had been sitting at my desk for many months, actually almost a year when it suddenly hit me that the use of space in the apartment really sucked.

Kat and I were tightly tucked in near the patio doors and the rest of the space was used for a so called living area that was crammed into another corner of the main room. Although our kitchen and bedroom areas seemed to function well, our working /living area was something that felt like a tornado hit and dropped things where they landed.

A change had to be made, but what? I sat while working as usual, constantly staring out at the space until the right combination of all things came together. So one Friday morning late last fall I presented my plan to the household; Kat and Juls were in favor of it. They eagerly waited to see how the new configuration would look. Please note; they did not just sit there and watch, they helped with the reconfiguration.

I was inspired and in a blink of an eye, computer wires were everywhere, books all over the place and the cleaning began as I tore apart all the computer hook ups, the bookcases and placing furniture where they would fit together better.

Hairball by hairball, dust bunnies and more dust bunnies were quickly sucked into the vacuum cleaner. Furniture was placed in new positions, a few new power bars later and the new setup was taking shape. There are many book cases and hundreds of books so of course I had to sit and browse through a few. Hey, I forgot I even had a history of the Three Stooges. L

Oh, did I mention, suddenly about 8 hours had passed by? My whole concept had fallen right into place with the exception of my desk not fitting in where I desired it. An easy solution was arrived at and Kat and I switched desks and all came together as intended.

Standing back and observing the result was one of huge satisfaction. Somehow within the same space we had all the identical stuff but a whole lot more room to move around. We also had a more functional space that was also pleasing.

Don't you just love it when a plan comes together with speed and ease?

Please enjoy the few shots of our new space from inside the apartment of The Magic Happens.
