

'Restructuring' My Life

I have always been a believer in the 'Law of Attraction' even before I was aware of it. As a teen-ager I worked on having positive thoughts and traits and tended to associate with others of the same mindset. As an adult I have continued the same trend. Not surprisingly, I have met quite a few people with similar values and beliefs but it wasn't until I met Kat that I realized it was actually a law.

Throughout my life and the lives of those I know, I had seen plenty of anecdotal evidence of the 'Law of Attraction' in action but I hadn't seen any scientific studies or explanations as to how and why this law functioned (I'm an engineer so I like to know how things work – yes, I often take things apart to see how they are put together and I do a lot of home projects to make sure the job is done correctly).

A few weeks ago the company I worked for 'restructured' and I was not part of the new plans.

This was a shock (though fourteen years at the same hi-tech company is considered extraordinary these days), but after some deliberation, it was really what I had been 'attracting'. I hadn't been happy there for a while and had been looking at other career possibilities. With my buyout and other options, I now had the time and money to pursue something I could enjoy.

What I am really looking forward to is spending the summer with my two daughters and my wife. The girls are getting to the age where hanging out with 'Dad' isn't cool any more so this might be my last chance for a while and I'm not going to waste it. The girls are just as excited and we are planning all sorts of day trips and activities. While they are finishing this semester at school I've been catching up on all the projects that I hadn't gotten around to.

One of the first items on my list was to read a book I had won as a door prize while attending an event with my wife. The book is called 'The Field' and at first glance I thought it would be somewhat akin to 'The Secret'. In a way it is similar to the 'Secret' but it is also quite different. It actually deals with the quantum physics and thousands of studies that explain why and how the 'Law of Attraction' works; exactly what I had been wondering about.

It makes sense to me as I see more and more evidence of the 'law' in action – I have no doubt it has always been active, I just am getting better at recognizing it.

One such 'recognition' is that where I once tended to separate work, home, friends, hobbies, etc, lately they have been merging together and the sum is greater than the individual parts. It's as though there is a greater attraction with the different aspects working together rather than separately. There are some very intriguing opportunities opening up to me now that I am eagerly looking forward to; involving the uniting of work with home and friends, even with hobbies. This 'restructuring' is definitely working for me.

Steve Elias
Eastern Ontario
Canada